Student-centric spaces for master learners

The College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, Arizona State University's largest and most diverse college, is located on the Tempe campus in Armstrong Hall. This historic space exemplifies The College's commitment to student success, from a prospective student's first campus visit to a graduate's walk across the stage for a diploma and beyond as an engaged alum. Remodeled classrooms include the newest technologies and learning platforms that enable students to become master learners, equipped to overcome any challenge and thrive in any future career. The resources offered to students in Armstrong Hall create unlimited opportunities for success.

A source for inspiration

- Dedicated spaces for prominent donor and distinguished alumni recognition
- Remodeled classrooms include the newest technologies and learning platforms
- Showcased student and faculty successes celebrate the college's breadth and depth
- Assorted workspaces for students and community to foster collaboration, creativity and innovation

Unparalleled student support

- Clustered advising hubs for each division: humanities, social sciences, natural sciences
- Centralized internship and career services center with a post-graduation hub and advising
- Sophisticated writing and language learning centers alongside several peer tutoring spaces

The Futures Center

Designed in partnership with ASU's Office of Career and Professional Development Services, the Futures Center is built to help students prepare for life after graduation. Whether their plan includes graduate school, a career or creating their own path, the Futures Center has the resources to help them thrive.

The College recognizes our central role in preparing our students for life after graduation. The Futures Center imparts students with practical knowledge and abilities to become well-rounded professionals who are ready for the next phases of life.

- Practice interviews.
- One-on-one mentoring.
- Employer information session.
- Alumni and community partner connections.
- Dedicated pre-professional advising services.
- Encouraged creativity and adaptability.
- How-to career workshops.
- Resume building.
- Cultivated professional development, interactive networking and civic engagement.
- Encouraged collaboration between students, alumni, businesses, nonprofits and community.
- Varied lectures, seminars, career expos and more to prepare students for the workforce.

Building better futures

Carol May, an ASU Department of Psychology alumna, donated to the Department of Psychology as part of her new initiative: The Carol May Reduce Sugar Consumption Research Project.

May's generous contribution was honored with the naming of the "Carol A. May, Wisdom Natural Brand Conference Room." Her passion for the health and futures of ASU students made the room a natural fit in The College's Futures Center, designed to prepare students for life after graduation by offering resources like practice interviews, resume advice and career workshops.

"I'm so grateful to be honored by this privilege of having my name attached to this immense opportunity to do good for thousands of people. This isn't just the headquarters of The College, this is the beginning of futures."
- Carol May

Zebulon Pearce is a historical figure in Arizona history whose legacy lives on at The College through the Zebulon Pearce Distinguished Teaching Awards and the Zebulon Pearce and Family Conference Room. The Pearce family pledged a five-year fund to support PhD students working through programs at the Institute of Human Origins. The Pearce family continues this legacy of philanthropy at ASU and their efforts are essential building blocks to drive research forward.

Who was Armstrong?

Armstrong Hall was named after John S. Armstrong. As the second youngest representative in the Thirteenth Legislative Assembly, Armstrong was appointed as chair of the House Education Committee. He introduced the legislative bill to establish higher education in the Territory of Arizona in 1885, including the Territorial Normal School at Tempe.

In 1901, the Arizona legislature instituted the official name as Tempe Normal School. Over the years the school name has changed to Tempe State Teachers College, Arizona State Teachers College and Arizona State College. In 1958, the name was changed to Arizona State University through a vote of the people, which recognized its academic standing and prominence.
